1400: Conversation Earth: Gross Domestic Product has now become a fetish, according to economist Raj Patel. Many undesirable things end up adding to GDP: wars, disease, and environmental destruction, for example. Meanwhile, GDP fails to measure many desirable indicators of community health. It has led us to live in an ecologically and socially unsustainable fashion. Patel feels the myth of growth has let us down, and we need new ways of sensing, of valuing, and of sharing the world around us. In this interview recorded in the Spring of 2010, Patel shares that, The tools with which we've been raised to help us understand the way the world works and how our future might be delivered to us, are broken. But it's OK, because there are loads of solutions around us in which we might manage the world differently and more sustainably. Raj Patel is a Research Professor at the University of Texas, and a Senior Research Associate at Rhodes University in South Africa. He has degrees from University of Oxford, the London School of Economics and Cornell University. He worked for the World Bank and the World Trade Organization, and protested against them around the world. Patel authored Stuffed and Starved and The Value of Nothing. He writes frequently for The Guardian, and his work has appeared in the Financial Times, Los Angeles Times, New York Times, and Times of India, to name a few. 1430: Conversation Earth: Anishinaabe orator, author, economist and activist Winona LaDuke doesn't mince words in her quest to light a path for us to hang around another thousand years. Winona observes that we are doing things only addicts would do, including sedating ourselves with a lot of information and television. Your ecosystem seems to be your mall, LaDuke tells us. The author of Recovering the Sacred tells us we need a society that is respectful, resilient, and ecologically and socially responsible. Instead, we have a society based on conquest, on consuming more than it needs. We emphasize quarterly profits over intergenerational responsibility. This interview, recorded in the Spring of 2015, confirms that the tenets of a sustainable economy are found in indigenous thinking. The conversation ranges from rights, responsibilities, and cultural baggage, to globalization, the pros and cons of urbanization, and the intelligence of economic growth as a public policy goal. 1900: Peace Talks Radio: The Series on Peacemaking and Nonviolent Conflict Resolution: Regarding Competition: On this edition, we invite you to do some critical thinking about competition. Does competition create character and excellence, or more often conflict and disillusionment? Or a bit of both? The flood of competition-based entertainment on television suggests our fascination with winners and losers, but is there a cost? What's behind our desire to see our favorite sports teams do well? What's the impact of competition on academics, workplaces and politics? Host Paul Ingles talks with author Alfie Kohn, who has pondered these and similar questions in his many provocative books. For another perspective, we talk with someone whose life has been a nearly unbroken string of competitions, college basketball coach Steve Alford. We also visit with a couple of teens to get their take on competition. Archive 03-11-2018 Podcaster's website ; Underwriter website
