1400: Conversation Earth: The age of growth and the age in which growth is going to be considered a good thing is coming to an end. The late sociologist William R. Catton was certain of this, but spent a significant portion of his professional life attempting to understand why mainstream society was reluctant to prove his point. Catton authored the landmark book, Overshoot: The Ecological Basis of Revolutionary Change, published in 1980. He brought important sociological perspective to a subject dominated by biologists and physicists. He observed that our lives are built around an obsolete cultural belief system, developed when the size of human civilization had not yet outgrown the carrying capacity of the planet. According to scientists at the Global Footprint Network, human civilization surpassed a sustainable scale (a combination of population and consumption) in the 1970s. Catton observed a lag between that reality and the dominant worldview that affects our rate of consumption " of both renewable and nonrenewable resources. 1430: Conversation Earth: Lorna Salzman has the chops to be an outspoken critic of many in the modern environmental movement. She played a key role in the early days of Friends of the Earth alongside David Brower (the first executive director of the Sierra Club), beginning a 40-year career as an environmental activist, writer, lecturer and organizer. A contender for the Green Party presidential nomination in 2004, Salzman is an iconoclast in every sense of the word. In this 2010 interview we hear Lorna Salzmanns thoughts about climate change, consumerism, cheap energy, economics, lawyers and politics. She discusses what went wrong with the environmental movement, plus irrationality, denial, and outright lies we tell ourselves, and each other. 1900: Peace Talks Radio: The Series on Peacemaking and Nonviolent Conflict Resolution: Peace Journalism: This time on Peace Talks Radio, we pose some questions about whether the manner in which journalists cover war and peace, has something to do with achieving peace and reducing conflict --- or do common conventions of reporting instead inflame conflict and omit viable non-violent options for resolving conflicts. And can severe hate speech and alarmist propaganda that threaten lives in developing nations be quelled with targeted training? Our conversation today starts with Steve Youngblood, the director for the Center for Global Peace Journalism at Park University in Parkville, Missouri. Also we'll hear from Ugandan Journalist Gloria Laker who took Youngblood's "Peace Journalism" workshops in Uganda, then helped facilitate them to other journalists across her homeland. Finally, Humankind radio producer David Freudberg, who calls for the development of a "Peace Beat" at news organizations, offers his thoughts on the responsibilities of journalists to cover conflict thoughtfully.
