1400: Conversation Earth: Our ecosystems contribute tens of trillions of dollars to our economy every year, but " as L. Hunter Lovins notes, At present were losing every major ecosystem on the planetWhat are we doing to ourselves?...We have theintelligenceto make different choices. Hunter Lovins co-authored the best-selling book, Natural Capitalism, with Paul Hawken and Amory Lovins. In this interview, she outlines those choices and shares how they benefit businesses and the planet. One of the biggest challenges to living sustainably, says Lovins, is our belief we can meet non-material needs through the purchase of material things. We keep spending all this money, and we arent getting any happier. Wouldnt you rather have more time than more stuff? She observes that we all have a profound hunger for authenticity, human connection, love. We recorded this interview in 2004, but offer it here because the concepts are as relevant today. 1430: Conversation Earth: One of the ways that radical ideas become more mainstream is when those of us who hold them arent afraid to speak about them. This thought has guided much of journalism professor Robert Jensens work. His writing and speaking often focus on the news that we live in an economy that is based on the destruction of places all over world. In this 2015 interview, Jensen explains what he calls an unprecedented set of threats to the possibility of ongoing, large-scale, human habitation of the planet. Jensen takes a critical approach to media and power. Much of his work has focused on pornography, a radical feminist critique of sexuality and men's violence, and white privilege and institutionalized racism. 1900: Peace Talks Radio: The Series on Peacemaking and Nonviolent Conflict Resolution: A Domestic Violence Story: Reforming Offenders/Protecting Victims: In Minnesota, 38-year old Robert King is trying to make peace in his relationship with his wife. After 20 years of abusing women, Robert finally was forced into getting help through what's now being referred to in domestic abuse circles as The Duluth Model - a Domestic Abuse Intervention Program " the heart of which is to get both offenders and victims to talk openly about their experiences, and to get multiple agencies to work cooperatively around the understanding gleaned from the true stories. So Robert King has been talking in these week after week sessions and learning how brutal he's been to women and how to break the cycle of violence. We hear him tell his honest story as well as hear from the man who's been leading the sessions Robert's been attending. That's Scott Miller, system coordinator for the Domestic Abuse Intervention Project in Duluth, Minnesota. Also featured, Melissa Scaia, Executive Director of Advocates for Family Peace in Grand Rapids, Minnesota. Carol Boss and Paul Ingles host.
